On the contrary, each State has an ermy of its own, in which the officers are hereditary. The armies are maintained, it appears, according to the Thakore Sahib, more to support the dignity of the princes than for any practical purpose. "No Indian prince," he says, "would ever think of disbanding his army." It is not retained, he is careful to suggest, for use against the English. "It was not an Indian mutiny," he asserts; "it was merely the rebellion of a number of troops of the British-Indian army, who were paid by the British-Indian government." As if to clinch his argument, so far at least as the native States are concerned, he adds: "We are as loyal to the Empress of India as any of her Have on hand a very large and v ... assorted stock of goods in their line.

The Morning Dress. It is said that a lady's standing in society can easily be determined by her dress at the breakfast-table; an expensive, showy costume indicating that the wearer has not yet learned the proprieties.
